Cold Water Process of Canning.

Wash the fruit thoroughly and in case of rhubarb cut into small pieces as for pies. If gooseberries are used top and tail them. Pack into glass jars that have been sterilized, then fill the jars to overflowing with freshly drawn water. Put on the covers and let them stand overnight. By the next morning you will find that the fruit has taken up more or less of the water and fill again with fresh cold water to overflowing, letting the water come within sufficient force to drive out any air. Then seal closely and put away for winter use. [From "Canning and Preserving Fruit," by Emma Padgett Telford, in the August "Circle".]

Cleaning up New Orleans.—People of the City cleaned up for the soldiers and sailors. In the morning the sleeping soldiers were ready for battle. The soldiers were given a visit by the "Seger Boys." Rations issued to the poor of the City. Freed from Prison.—A Love Letter.—A Girl's Story.

We were frequently reminded by the citizens that we would all die with the yellow fever before the summer was over; which might have proved true if the city had remained in as true a condition as when we arrived there. Not only were the streets and alleys filthy, but the canals and ditches that drained the city were used as dumping places for all sorts of offal and decayed matter, including dead dogs, cats, rats, and every other thing that happened to die except "humans." No such state of things would have been allowed to exist for a day in any of our northern cities.

General Butler was equal to the task of changing things for the better. Books were found in the streets of the office where some of the wealthiest citizens had pledged certain sums of money for the support of the Confederate government, and Butler obliged them to pay the cleaning of the city. This gave work to the poor whites, and relieved the pain in many a hungry stomach.

In carrying dispatches through some sections of the city where our troops were in close proximity it was necessary that two of us go together with loaded guns; but we were interfered with but once. Passing a house on a street corner a gang of five or six young men came out and made some threatening talk when we leveled our muskets, ready to fire, they fled from our sight.

General Butler's quick and stern way of pronouncing penalties for misconduct among the subjects of his stern rule was a man whom he wished the St. James' hotel (then used as a hospital) would burn down.

Six parole prisoners were ordered to be shot for violating their parole by recruiting for a Guerrilla company and running them through our lines. They were reprieved by President Lincoln; the order being handed to the officer in charge of the shooting squad as the men stood beside their coffins, not a minute before they would have been shot.

For pulling down the American flag from the U. S. mint, Mumford was hung. The gallows were erected beside the same building where the executioner there. Col. Kimball was the executioner. It was that Mumford's wife was among the crowd that witnessed the execution.

A woman was sent a prisoner to Ship Island for spitting on the general. Butler from the second story of her house as he was passing on the sidewalk below. That was not the first insult offered our soldiers by the grand dames of New Orleans, who called forth Butler's famous order, which he put into effect. I do not remember the exact wording of the order but it was to the effect that women who indulged in insulting behavior as common, or less than common, were to be shot.

All these things happening in quick succession had a salutary effect on the people; and although it was known that there was a secret organization among the rebels in the city, which purposed to make an attack on our soldiers and murder us in our quarters, we were not molested.

Every night we laid by our loaded guns with our clothes on, ready, at a moment's warning. One night we were suddenly awakened by the sound of the long roll, and in one minute the Regiment was on the street and in line ready for a fight. The Colonel gave the order, "Attention!" Then he turned to the right and called out just to see how quickly we could get into line, then the order was given, "Break Ranks!"

In the basement of the mint was found hidden away a large pile of spears, numbering many hundreds, and handles nearly six feet long and blades twelve to fourteen inches in length; and it was believed that an attack had been planned with the intention of using these weapons upon us as we slept.

Captain Fessenden, who would have been one of our smartest officers if rum had not ruined him, was there dishonorably discharged from the service for desertion. He staid around awhile, and one evening came in saying he had drunk sixteen glasses that day. He went to his bunk and fell asleep, but awoke in another world; where, let us hope, brains cannot be muddled by rum.

In travelling back and forth from the Mint to the Custom House I used to change routes frequently, as there were three streets that led quite directly to it. On one street there was a large tree, sometimes registered one hundred and ten or twelve for several days in succession. On another street there could be almost always be seen, through the window of a richly furnished parlor, a beautiful young lady sitting idly in an easy chair. It always seemed to me that she was proud of her beauty and of her attire and sat there to be seen and admired. To my mind there was a vast difference between her and the girls back in old Maine who were always smart to spin and knit and sew and do housework and the Yankee girls didn't suffer by the comparison.

There were two houses of ill repute in sight of the Mint. One was called the "Amsterdam" and the other "Green Tree." Along in the shady part of the afternoon the inmates would come out for a walk, and when they got within speaking distance the soldiers would be liable to haze them, calling them, "The Rebel Fleet" and the more the creturs raved about it the better it suited the boys. Those were the days of swamping big hoops (or should I say crinolines?) and beautiful young ladies in such style looked as much like a fleet of battleships as anything. But it was not all fun for our boys, who dropped into the Amsterdam one evening to see them dance, and for his part of the hazing got a stab in the side from a knife in the hand of one of the bad women, that came near costing him his life.

The nearest way to and from the Custom House led by the "Green Tree," and sometimes extra work would keep me out until they had commenced their evening dance. The hall having double doors opening on the street, a policeman was supposed to stand there with club in hand to keep order.

One evening, when passing the place, I saw that a light was on between some soldiers and marines who had gathered there as spectators. The fight lasted only a minute, but when a big soldier from Bangor, Me., formerly a blacksmith, with his long arms, and fists as big as a peck measure, took a hand in it they soon gave up. But where was the policeman? Looking down the street I could see nothing but the bottoms of his feet he was running so fast to get away. The Police Department had been organized, and citizens, qualified by swearing allegiance to the United States were doing that duty.

Shortly after that, when passing the place just at dusk; the old Dutch woman, who seemed to be the head of the family, dragged a girl by the arm out on the street and told her to go and never come back. The girl was crying, and grasping my arm begged me to protect her. Said she had just come from prison and if the police saw her on the street they would send her back. She was bareheaded, poorly clad, and her face was covered with large red blotches.

I asked her what had brought her to that condition, and with tears running down her cheeks she answered "poverty" and "disappointment." Suddenly she let me go and darted down a dark alley to pass the night in hiding from the police. Poor wretch! she was yet one of the great human family, let us cover her sins with the mantle of charity.

"Do not look for faults as you go through life, it is wise and kind to be somewhat blind, and look for the virtues behind them."

We regretted to leave our pleasant quarters in the mint, but it was necessary for us to move; and for a short time we occupied a large tenement house then moved into a large building formerly used as a cotton press. It was in the sight of the old battle ground where General Jackson fought the British. There was plenty of room, and after building bunks to sleep on it was quite a pleasant home. My bed was near a large open door that led on to a street where there was quite an amount of travelling.

Comrade Watson and myself were sitting on the door sill one day, when two little, golden haired girls came along, sides, which they seemed pleased enough to do. We found them to be interesting children; and so made our conversation as agreeable as possible, hoping that they would like to sit down by us on the other side of the street, casting shy glances our way now and then that gave us the impression that some one had been telling them that the "Tanks" were everything that was bad.

A young girl came got to visiting our quarters evenings, whose parents were both dead. She lived with a relative who was very poor, the same as herself. Some evenings she prolonged her stay to be agreeable to me, but I disliked to tell her to go home. What a nuisance was in staying so late was a puzzle to me. I didn't think she was old enough (fourteen) to mean courtship or matrimony, and as no invitation to call again was given her, hoped she would not continue her visits without being told to do so.

The large door, which was close to my bunk, had been barred across with joists set a few inches apart so that there could be no passing out and in, and callers were obliged to remain on the outside.

I tried to decide which to do, sit up and entertain this young damsel every night until ten o'clock or tell her to stay at home. Finally I appealed to my brother to help me out, and he agreed to tell her that I was absent. So when we saw her coming I stepped out of sight and he told her that I was away, then went about his own affairs. After while I came out to tell her that she was waiting for me. Our plan had failed.

The next evening I hid away out of sight but not out of hearing, and my brother told her I had gone away because I didn't want to see her. Great relief didn't she let that first tongue lashing she could say more disagreeable things to the minute than any person I ever heard "jaw." She even accused me of keeping her out there every night until her relatives locked their doors against her. However that terminated the visits of Ann Malony, thanks to my obliging brother.

Being on detached duty, it was my privilege to pass in and out by the guard at any time. "What are your quarters at five o'clock p. m. I usually see you after parade I could see the Regiment on parade. Several of the nearby residents often gathered there to watch the parade and to improve the time in getting acquainted with the young southerners.

Memory brings before me two young girls, servants in a wealthy family whose residence was but a few rods away. The girls were very pleasant and kind and after parade was over. By the front door was a vine covered arbor furnished with seats; and there I used to sit and chat with Ellen and Mary Ann. They were both Catholics and both Irish and their genial manners and kind attentions to a Union soldier far from home made a bright spot in my memories of Army life. Ellen was engaged to be married but Mary Ann was "fancy free," nice looking with big brown eyes, brown, curly hair, all in ripples about her head, rosy cheeks and a bright smile. I really took to Mary Ann.

They told me what horrible stories the Rebels had told them about the "Yanks." Said that we were savages, not like other human beings but had horns growing out of our foreheads.

Sometimes when the family had something nice to eat the girls would bring Mary Ann brought me a dish of "gumbo," a soup made of okra pods, stewed and seasoned highly with red peppers; at other times it was cakes, oranges or lemonade.

When I made my last call before leaving the city, Mary Ann asked me if I would accept a little memento from me if of our pleasant acquaintance. "Yes!" I said, I would be happy to, something like that could be sent to my home in a letter. She brought out a card, bordered with raised flowers, with this stanza printed in the oval center.

"Love's light is beaming o'er us, love! And Hymen weaves a rosy spell, Here faithful hearts are joined to dwell."

That card had been carefully kept to this day among other souvenirs of the war.

The poor people of the city were so destitute that Butler ordered that rations be issued to them—to all, friend and foe alike. Thus the relatives of rebel soldiers drew their daily rations from Uncle Sam's storehouse; and while the authorities of our Government were showing such a magnanimous spirit toward their enemies the Confederacy was starving our soldiers to death in Southern prisons.

Every morning large crowds of poor people would gather around our Quartermaster's building, so eager and furious with hunger that it took a strong guard of soldiers to keep them at proper distance while the food was being distributed. There is no doubt but that great suffering would have followed had food not been given them.

When the last Louisiana Reg't was recruited for the Union army, an order from Headquarters was handed me for the pardon of a man in prison on condition that he enlist as a United States soldier. The warden, when I passed him the order, unlocked the prisoner's door and I looked into the cell. It was about five feet wide and ten feet long square. There was no seat and his bed was blankets spread on the stone floor. And here a human being had existed for six years. He was a middle aged man serving a life sentence for murder; but doubt was felt as to his guilt, which fact was considered in his pardon. General Shepley was Military Governor of the State and had the Court Records to refer to.

The prisoner was a son of Erin and overjoyed at the thought of freedom and readily agreed to enlist. One thing troubled me somewhat. If he did not pass the Surgeon's exam. I was supposed to return him to prison, a very unpleasant duty. I concluded that if he did not pass I should not run myself out of breath to catch him if he succeeded to parts unknown.

We went to the examiner's office who proved to be the Surg. of my own Reg't, 12th Maine. After looking him over the Surgeon said he could pass him on account of various veins, but after I explained the circumstances said he would pass him if the poor fellow was glad to do so. He was happy as well as he knew his clear of that prison cell.

A comrade, whose home was up in Franklin Co. on the banks of the beautiful Sandy river, had left a sweetheart there, who was, presumably, waiting for some assurance of his continued affection; but he being rather a clumsy writer and not much on composition felt as if he could not do justice in the case, so came to me for assistance. I gladly consented to conduct the correspondence for him, and wrote just what I thought he would be likely to say if he was with her in the parlor of her father's old farmhouse whispering the words right into her ear. As a soldier he was true to his country, and as a lover, true to his girl. They united in marriage after the war and are still living happily together.

At Baton Rouge, when the rebels attacked our soldiers with a superior force, it became necessary for the men on our gunboats to hurl bombs of the house in the town in order to throw shells into the rebel ranks. Among those who lost their homes was a family who afterwards came down to New Orleans. Their eldest girl was a charmer, and had admirers in several different regiments. Their eldest girl was a charmer. Comrade Isaac became smitten; was the owner of a valuable watch which this girl took quite a fancy to and asked for the privilege of carrying it a few days. Comrade Isaac readily consented, and that was the last he ever saw of watch or girl.

The family all left for parts unknown. How many more soldiers got the mitten and lost watches I never ascertained.

BUCKFIELD.
Debt Decreased.

The debt of $800 and interest for six months against the Methodist society, incurred by extensive repairs made two years ago, has recently been reduced to $430, John Lewis Childs of Floral Park, N. BOLSTER'S MILLS.
 Counts its Blessings.

Although Bolster's Mills is to be deprived of its postoffice it is by no means but entirely out of existence. If the mail does have to go up round by Waterford or down by Portland and up through the Scotch, we get it sometime. If news was only like wine that age would improve how rich ours would be, but thanks to our genial stage driver, Eastman, we are not wholly out as he brings us the Advance direct from the stage and we can boast over the less fortunate R. F. D.'s who have to wait a day and a half for theirs.

Would like to say to the editor that a lady's black hat was found in the road between Stuart's Corner and Bolster's Mills on Tuesday last, that he can have, if no owner calls for, to add to his collection.

Albro R. Jenness.

Albro R. Jenness died at his home last week Thursday, at the age of 71 years. A short account of the cause of his death may be found on page 7.

He was born in Barton, Vt., February 13, 1836. He went first to St. Johnsbury, Vt., and from there to Boston in pursuit of work. He took the first job offered him, which was as a stockholder handling freight at the wharves in Boston. He lived economically and in a short time had saved enough to buy a single truck team and commenced to do business for himself. He soon added other teams and later became a member of the Glover & Co. trucking establishment.

In the mean time he had made a home for himself, having married Mrs. Jerusha Hill Brackett of Somerville, and after her decease, Abigail Hill Osgood, formerly a Fryeburg woman. He leaves two brothers and one sister, Richard H. Jenness and Austin P. Jenness, members of a trucking firm in Boston, and Mrs. M. C. Green of Cambridge, Mass.

He was a member of the Fryeburg lodge, No. 1, F. and A. M. of Fryeburg, by adoption having been raised in the John Abbott lodge of Somerville, Mass., a member of Waverly Chapter, and De Molay Commandery of Boston, a member of Kora Temple, Lewiston, and the Frigate lodge, No. 24, K. of P., Fryeburg.

The news of his death will bring unexpected sadness to a great many friends who have been blessed with his acquaintance. Mr. Jenness was, from manhood to 1875, a leading business man in Boston. By careful saving of his earnings he soon established himself in a business that gradually gave him a competence, when he sold out and came to Fryeburg, the early home of his wife.

Here he bought one of the finest residences in that historic old town and took up a life of ease. But the work habit was too strong to be laid aside, and he soon was engaged in various active enterprises. He was instrumental in securing and constructing the Fryeburg Water Works, furnishing the place with most excellent water from hills in New Hampshire. He was also one of the promoters of the building of "The Oxford," that fine hotel which was burned last year, overseeing the building of it from foundation to finish. He engaged in lumber operations, being associated with E. B. Cotton and Dr. C. E. Harris, in a large cutting-up-mill, and also putting in an electric lighting system in the village. This mill was destroyed by fire three years ago, and at the time of his death he was having constructed a dam at Swan's Falls, to restore this plant.

His word was as good as his bond—his integrity beyond question. He was treasurer of the West Oxford Agricultural Society for several years, and also of the Fryeburg academy. As soon as he had placed those institutions on a good basis he gave them to other hands. He was a very generous man, and many a young man and woman has been assisted through the academy course by his liberality. Some of whom the writer knows never knew from whence their tuition was paid.

But when he could turn from his business, out-of-doors sports claimed his attention. He was part owner in the Small Point club, being one of its founders—had a fine camp at East Sebago in common with two of his intimate friends, James Merrill of Palmyra and H. B. Cotton of Conway, N. H. He also shared with Col. E. C. Farrington, a gunner for 30 years he and Col. Farrington had annually met for fall shooting. No man in that part of the State has done more for the fish and game interests than Mr. Jenness. He was always ready to put out his money liberally to stock waters or to protect fish and game. He was a charter member of the Maine Sportsmen's Fish and Game Association and continued an active member to his death.

It was the writer's good fortune to be his friend. To be near a man like Mr. Jenness, was to come in touch with the best that is in manhood. He loved nature as few men do. The ripple in the water, the floating shadowy clouds upon the mountain sides, the falling of the autumn leaves, the songs of the birds, and in the sweet scented fields he would gather lessons of love and good will to man.

How often I have sat beside him in the early October morning, when the great orb of day came up in the east and cast its first rays upon the mountain tops of Mt. Washington, Bald Eagle, Keegan and kindred mountain giants, lighting up their crests with a crimson glory, and heard him say, "this is a sight worth living to see, and how few there are whose heart and soul have been moved by so beautiful a view as this." His memory and his good name rests securely in the hearts of his hosts of friends.

The funeral services were held at his home in Fryeburg on Sunday afternoon, July 29, at 1 o'clock. The burial services were conducted by Rev. B. N. Stone, pastor of the Church of the New Jerusalem. They consisted of reading of the scriptures, prayer, the reading of Tonyson's "Farewell to the Bard" and a hymn, "His favorite hymn," "O Lord All Glorious, Life of Life," the chant, "Behold, the Tabernacle of God is With Them" and "Gathering Home" were sung by a quartet composed of B. T. Newman, tenor; Mrs. E. E. Hastings, soprano; Mrs. L. O. Wentworth, alto and C. G. Willard, bass.

The floral tributes from friends and fraternal orders were very many and they were arranged in many beautiful designs. The pall bearers were Dr. C. H. Harris, John L. Osgood, Wesley McKee and L. R. Charles. The burial was in Pine Grove cemetery where the Pythagorean lodge, F. & A. M., No. 11, with representatives of the K. of T. Temple of Lewiston, held Masonic services which were conducted by Past Master Edward E. Hastings, with Frank Sawtelle as chaplain.
